The concentration field inside a cylindrical shell undergoing dissolution, dissolving in a non-convective and non-isothermal flow, is studied numerically using a 2D finite difference method with particular attention given to the accurate description of the velocity profile that appears at the interface between the solid and the dissolved shell. A realistic example of dissolution (in this case, the dissolution of an oil slick in the sea) is modelled using a standard in situ optical observation system and analytical models. A good agreement is observed between the concentration field predicted using the numerical simulations and the in situ observations. When the saturation in the dissolved phase is close to unity, a concentration front is formed by the capillary flow of the dissolved phase. The front position is found to be in good agreement with the predictions of the analytical model. When the saturation in the dissolved phase is close to zero, a constant concentration field is predicted. The influence of the radial position of the interface on the concentration field is studied. This is found to strongly influence the front position. The influence of the porosity of the dissolved shell on the front position is studied. This is found to be small for the example considered. Finally, the influence of the non-Newtonian behaviour of the flow is studied. This is found to significantly change the behaviour of the concentration field when the viscosity contrast between the fluid and the solid is high.Q: Yahoo Mail API V3 Login CSRF Error I have been having problems with the Yahoo Mail API V3.
