mbsdchina@gmail.com Morphometric analysis of superior semicircular canal morphology to characterize congenital acoustic neurinoma. The purpose of this study was to determine whether morphological analysis of the superior semicircular canal can be used to distinguish congenital acoustic neurinoma (CNAN). Thirty-one surgically resected CNANs were included. Each CNAN was obtained from patients with bilateral CNANs. The specimens were scanned by high-resolution magnetic resonance imaging, and the long diameter and width of the superior semicircular canal were measured and compared between the bilateral CNANs. There were no statistically significant differences between the right and left superior semicircular canals of the unilateral CNANs in terms of the differences between the measurements of the lumen and wall and the volume of the semicircular canal. The differences between the measurement of the left and right superior semicircular canals were significantly larger in the bilateral CNANs. There was no statistically significant difference in terms of the difference between the right and left superior semicircular canals among the CNANs with and without vestibular aqueduct. The volume and the long diameter of the superior semicircular canal were significantly larger in the bilateral CNANs compared with the unilateral CNANs. The measured difference between the CNANs with and without a vestibular aqueduct was similar. The volume and the long diameter of the superior semicircular canal were larger in the bilateral CNANs compared with the unilateral CNANs, but this was not significantly different. The differences in the superior semicircular canal measurements of the bilateral CNANs were statistically significant. These results suggest that morphological analysis of the superior semicircular canal can be used to distinguish congenital acoustic neurinoma. Q: Is there a way to reduce the size of C++
