Global Undertakings Global Undertakings (Gunderings, Inc. in print) was a stock trading platform based in New York City. Under the direction of Erik Krause, the platform was created in 2002 and headquartered in Midtown Manhattan. Gurrwing quickly and posting double-digit annual growth rates, it was one of the largest and most successful U.S. financial technology (FinTech) companies to date. By 2014, the company had 55 employees and $160 million in annual revenue, and was well known for its high retention rates among its employees. By then, the company operated in over 40 countries and consulted to a range of leading financial institutions. In late 2015, founder Erik Krause announced that he was leaving the company and that the company would close down by the end of the year. Service From its inception, Global Undertakings was a US-only service that enabled its clientele to trade shares and ETFs globally at a lower cost and without having to deal with the fees and complications associated with trading on the global stock markets. The company was founded on the belief that access to financial information is a fundamental human right that should be available to everyone, everywhere. The company expanded its service to cover equities, futures, and other instruments in the late 2000s. In 2009, Global Undertakings began a program to build a socially responsible business in the form of a 501(c)3 organization. History 2002-2008 Global Undertakings was founded by Erik Krause in 2002, following a failed venture with a French online transaction processing company. Launched from his basement in New York City's lower west side, the company was initially a technology company developing a variety of online financial services, including low-cost trading platforms for equities, futures and other instruments. In addition to its digital technology, Global Undertakings provided services in terms of operations, compliance and marketing. Gunderings' team tackled the speed, multiple-language and regulatory challenges required for the growing number of people in emerging markets to trade globally. The New York financial center has long been the trading center for the global markets, and it was difficult to market the company to its clients around the globe, as they required English-language advertisements. By 2006, the company decided to base its operations outside the United States, and moved to offices in London and then Frankfurt. In addition to its operations, Global Undertakings

Q: Android onReceiveListener doesn't always get the message I am implementing a service on a Samsung S3 with Android 4.2.2. This service is registered in the manifest, however the onReceive() method is never called. I have read various sources that say this is a known issue with Android 4.2, but nothing specific to my situation. I have modified the Java source for the service, so I know that it is being registered on the service manager. The code for the onReceive() method follows: @Override public void onReceive(Context context, Intent intent) { Log.d("MessageReceiver", "Received message"); } I am using the sample code located here: The service is registered like so: I have a separate broadcast receiver that sends messages to this service, and in my service I can see that the broadcast receiver is actually firing (it sends a message to my service, but onReceive is never called). My question is, why is this service not calling the onReceive() method for the custom broadcast receiver? A: It is an issue in Android 4.2. The solution is to add the service to a list in your receiver. Btw, there are alternative methods to receive messages, for example
