In this study, the E. coli O139:K88 vaccine was investigated with regard to its efficacy in protecting piglets against infection with wild type E. coli O139:K88. Three groups of 20 7-week-old piglets, taken from a herd free of E. coli O139:K88, were vaccinated with 10(9) colony-forming units (cfu) of a live, attenuated (DKC3) E. coli O139 vaccine. These piglets were then challenged with 10(10) cfu E. coli O139:K88, compared with a group of 20 unvaccinated piglets (control group), all of which were challenged with 10(10) cfu of the same strain of E. coli O139:K88. At the time of challenge, the titres of serum IgG specific for E. coli O139:K88 reached the peak value in the control and vaccine groups. Seven days post-infection, the vaccinated piglets showed a significantly lower average faecal E. coli O139:K88 concentration (1491.8 cfu/g dry faeces) than the unvaccinated control animals (10522.1 cfu/g dry faeces). The overall seroconversion rates at 21 days post-vaccination in the control and vaccinated
