The Senate judiciary committee is asking eBay to detail the use of personal information obtained through its “Buy It Now” and “Instant Sale” services by the companies that sell goods through the site. “In light of recent news reports of third-party data breaches and security vulnerabilities that are having negative impacts on consumers, it is in the public interest to investigate whether eBay has collected and used personal information about its users to enhance its own business,” according to the letter, signed by committee chairman Chuck Grassley. The committee has requested eBay report on a variety of questions, including how often the company uses buyers’ personal information to improve its service.

The company has said it doesn't do such tracking.

“Senator Grassley is raising this important issue in light of recent high-profile data breaches that consumers have experienced,” eBay spokeswoman Suzanne Trotella said in a statement. “We understand he has an interest in consumers’ privacy and want to give him a thorough response.” Q: Cannot figure out how to split an integer into digits in Java I am trying to figure out how to split a number into a string of digits. I am pretty sure that it is a simple string operation, but I have been stuck for a while. I am working with an api that returns a csv of data. The api has an integer, which has been broken up into a string of csv characters (a single character representing a value, along with a comma and a space). The problem I have is that I need to convert the integer value that comes back from the api into a number. I am trying to do something like this: if (value == 1) { //code to convert the string into a number and finally return it } else { //code to throw an error } The issue is that the conversion function is returning 0 in the else statement. The 648931e174
