This invention relates to reinforced elastic plastic materials, and, more particularly, to elastic materials reinforced with oriented, heat treated glass fabrics. Vinyl elastomers, such as ethylene vinyl acetate copolymers and acrylic or olefin elastomers are widely used in a variety of applications. Such materials are relatively inexpensive and have good physical properties. As an example, ethylene-vinyl acetate copolymers are used for automotive steering components, such as automobile steering columns, trim, and rockers because of their resistance to corrosion and their good low temperature flexibility. They are used in many other automotive components, as well, because of their fuel economy and their good impact strength. Unlike their thermoplastic counterparts, most elastomers are inherently non-polar. They contain little or no ionic or polar groups which can interact with the surface of the reinforcing substrate. As a result, elastomeric materials typically have the surfaces on their outer and inner faces that are essentially neutral or non-polar. Since such surfaces are essentially non-polar, elastomers tend to be incompatible with most reinforcing substrate materials. It has been recognized that improvement in the adhesion of elastomeric materials to reinforcing substrates can be accomplished by utilizing a reinforcing substrate having polar groups. For example, polyamide fibers and other polar substrate materials have been used to enhance the adhesion of elastomers to reinforcing substrates. The composites that are formed are generally formed into components, such as those used in the automotive industry, by co-injection molding. In the co-injection molding of compos
