Expected Impact The methodologies and procedures documented in this product are used by the HPC research community to perform analysis and achieve their goals, improve their researchers' and students' understanding of the data and methods used, and in general to improve computer efficiency. These tasks are summarized as follows: Generate a new approach, often through development of new models or algorithms, that is not readily available from documented data or methods. Use a new and different approach, different from simply re-implementing an existing algorithm that is documented, to pursue a research direction not previously pursued. Apply a comprehensive, unique, and valuable methodology, or group of methodologies and procedures, for analyzing data, not documented in the literature. Develop a groundbreaking method, not available in the literature or, if available in the literature, the method is difficult to implement or leads to a lack of understanding of the underlying fundamental basis. In each of these areas the researcher will demonstrate a significant effort in: Identification of a particular topic area and an understanding of the basic theories underlying the topic area. Consideration of the foundational data and methods, including parameter, statistic, or model
